CHAPTER XIII.

That night, after the drawing-room was deserted, I sat alone there.

I leaned my cheek against the velvet armohair, which still seemed to keep the impress and even the perfume of her black hair.

chair, which still seemed to keep the impress and even the perfume of her black hair. Long meditations seized me. All my past life glided before me in a moving picture—the latter half of it standing still like a diorama under my gaze. Then it began less to fade than to change—new forms mingling with the old, confusedly at first. Gradually the old shapes melted out, without any sense of loss, and the new, the transcending beautiful and perfect seems stood out before me vivid as life itself.

I said in my heart: "Every man, at every great crisis of his existence, has a right, within reasonable bounds, to secure his own happiness, to grasp at the cup which he feels would be his soul's strength and saivation. It shall be so. Therefore, to-morrov—to-morrow—to-m ment it all came back. I could have written a great book, have lived agreat life, have achieved the most daring exploit, have nerved mysolf to the most heroic sacrifice.

This was what she had made of me—she, and he, James Corrie, whom I honored with all my soul. But—I loved her.

Strange, solemn love—more selemn than in any young man's love—love that comes in autumn season—wild as autumn blasts—delicious and calm as autumn sunshine. Delicious, not merely as itself, but as the remembrance of bygone spring—lung to as we cling to overy soft October day that dies, knowing that afterward nothing can come, nothing will come, nothing ought to come, but winter and snows. This fatal love—I say fatal, simply implying that it came of fate, which means of God—was upon me, Alexander Fyfe, now.

I will not deny it, nor murmur at it, nor blush for it; I never sought it, nor rushed in the way of it—it was sent—and therefore was right to come.

Slowly, and rather loth, I went to my Slowly, and rather loth, I went to my chamber. In our parlor I saw Austin Hardy.

He was sitting over the fire. I should have passed him, but he turned round. Such a face—such a wan, haggard, wretched face—that I stopped.
